Annex 1: Dialogue Theme

Conference Theme: Social Cohesion in Asia

Over the past year, numerous obstacles to social cohesion have emerged or expanded within the Asian region. Social cohesion can be defined as the capacity of a society to ensure the welfare of all its members, minimizing disparities and avoiding polarization. From the tensions brought about by the global Covid-19 pandemic to the rising geopolitical unrest and competition globally, these issues threaten to undermine social cohesion within the region and its nations. These threats to social cohesions are worrisome as social cohesion is often the precursor to the discussion and solution of deep-seated social inequality and many other geopolitical issues.

In response to these rising threats, this Dialogue will hone in on social cohesion and specifically focus on five sub-themes inextricably related to it: 1) Culture and Identity, 2) Income Inequality and Social Mobility, 3) A Growing Intergenerational Divide, 4) Media, Information and Technology and 5) Healthcare and Well-Being. These sub-themes are not mutually exclusive and are interrelated.

Sub-theme 1: Culture and Identity

Culture and identity are important concepts to strengthening social relations and ties. Discrimination may stem from issues of identity, with identity encompassing a range of diverse aspects, such as gender, race, ethnicity, religion, etc. Identity is a politically sensitive issue, and the social cohesion of minority and majority groups are delicate issues to maneuver. In cities with large immigrant populations, social integration is key to reducing xenophobia.

Sub-theme 2: Income Inequality and Social Mobility

Economic inclusion is an important aspect of social cohesion. This encompasses issues like rectifying inequality, providing equal access to opportunities, and improving social mobility. Most countries do focus on related policies by providing safety nets or social welfare to vulnerable groups. While focusing on payouts is one way of improving social cohesion, there is still the social aspect to consider, such as the prevalence of marginalized communities, notions of social class and equal access to opportunities. For example, all over the world, students faced challenges as classes shifted online due to the lack of reliable internet access or technology. This is especially so for those who come from disadvantaged backgrounds.

Sub-theme 3: Growing Intergenerational Divide

With an aging population in many cities all over the world, the intergenerational divide poses an additional challenge to social cohesion. With the context of the COVID-19 situation, there remains much room for improvement in communicating social safety nets or health information to the elderly, especially in the employment of technology for processes such as contact tracing. Patient and clear communication is important to bridging the intergenerational gap.

Sub-theme 4: Media, Information and Technology

The prevalence of social media platforms as a way of information dissemination has changed the landscape of communication in countries all over the world. While the viral nature of social media platforms allows timely dissemination of news, they may also have propagated the spread of fake news. The spread of fake news may take a toll on the citizens' mental health, causing unnecessary worry in the population. At the same time, the large variety of media sources globally may also make it hard for citizens to absorb or stay afloat with the latest updates.

Sub-theme 5: Healthcare and Well-Being

Healthcare and well-being are topics clearly relevant in a global pandemic. Some related issues include accessibility, accurate information dissemination for health advisories, mental health, and work-life balance issues during a global pandemic. Issues of accessibility are even more salient with classes moving online, as lecturers must now consider how the new medium impacts students with disabilities.
